

Hillel used to say, stay not apart from the community. Trust not yourself until the day of your death. Judge not your fellow until you come into his situation. Say nothing that is unintelligible in the hope that it will be understood ultimately. Say not, "When I have leisure I will study;" perchance you will have no leisure. He would say, a crude man will not be afraid of sin, an ignorant pious, the timid learned, the irate a teacher, nor the one engrossed in business a scholar. In a place where there are no men strive to be a man.
